6 Updraft: Learning the Laws of Flight and Loss By Christina Ammon

This summer I learned how to fly. Though "humanity's oldest dream" of flying was realized long ago—when the Montgolfier brothers first sent up a sheep, rooster, a duck and finally two men in their homemade hot air balloon—flight never seems to lose its sense of magic. Back in high school, I learned all about Bernoulli's Law of Flight—how airplanes can fly because the air above their wing moves faster than the air below. Still, when I peer out the window from an 500,000 pound jetliner, it seems like an impossible phenomenon. Same goes for my paraglider. Looking like nothing more than a bedsheet with strings attached to it, it somehow safely suspends my gravity-bound flesh and blood in the air. Sometimes no amount of rational explanation can negate certain bedrock mysteries like where beings go after they die, or miracle of birth. Flying is one of those eternal phenomena.

Christina Ammon, recipient of an Oregon Literary Arts fellowship for nonfiction, has a new hobby: flying. Readers who may have steered their eyes toward the sky just south of Jacksonville on Hwy 238 are probably familiar with seeing a sky filled with tiny winged...humans! Ammons provides an intimate glimpse into the world of paragliding as it happens in our region.

Exchanging Thoughts About the Jefferson Exchange

In my September 2007 column I reported upon changes in progress at the Jefferson Exchange, JPR's weekday public affairs/talk program on the News and Information Service, and invited listener comments on the various hosts who have appeared on the program since the program's regular host stepped down on June 28.

As a result, we've received a number of emails and telephone calls from individuals with observations to share about the interim hosts who've appeared on the program. While, obviously, no single such comments are dispositive, collectively they have been generally thoughtful, helpful and interesting.

The summer months also have provided me an opportunity to think about the Jefferson Exchange and, as opposed to my September column which simply reported upon events, I'd like to share a few of my thoughts about the program in general.

First, the Jefferson Exchange was launched in 1994 (making it a relatively early public radio talk program). At the time the News and Information Service stations consisted of KSJK(AM), Talent/Ashland and KAGI(AM), Grants Pass. Thus, while topics discussed could theoretically run the gamut, practically speaking only listeners in Jackson and Josephine counties in Oregon could participate. Obviously, since then JPR has grown tremendously and the Jefferson Exchange can now be heard from Mendocino to Eugene over 8 radio stations. The mix of callers who can participate, and the topics which would conceivably be of interest to them, clearly has dramatically expanded.

Thus, it seemed to me that the changes in progress during the summer have provided us an important opportunity to "rethink" the program to assure that we are fulfilling our goals for the program and best serving our listeners' interests. That isn't to say that we are not. It's simply to observe that a great deal has changed since the program was launched – and we have never had a reason to comprehensively engage in a discussion about whether the program has effectively evolved in light of those changes.

For example, in 1994 we were a bit terrified that no one would call in. Audience levels were quite low, which was not surprising because the Jefferson Exchange was a new program heard exclusively on AM stations (which tend to have smaller audiences than FM stations). As a result, we built a number of elements into the program to give the hosts "refuge" in case they had too few calls and were running out of things to talk about. Some of those elements were weather breaks, regional newscasts, a segment called Fresh Voices, As It Was, The Writers' Almanac with Garrison Keillor, and other items that were essentially interruptions in the program's flow. In 1994, we often needed those segments to give our early hosts a "breather." We still have most of those breaks formatted into the program – but we now generally have sufficient callers that not all callers make it onto the air. That suggests that we should again think about the program's structure.

One comment contained in some of the emails, letters and phone calls we've received about the program during the summer months, has been that the program had become "predictable." That word covers a lot of territory but, at some intuitive level, I tend to agree with the observation. The question really is, "What produces that sense among listeners?" and what steps should we take to respond to it. We're thinking about that as well.

It has also been observed that, during the interview segments of the Jefferson Exchange, we tend to have experts on the air and callers' roles are to pose questions to them. In contrast, during the 8 AM hour, we've tended to

As we prepare for Thanksgiving, writer Diana Coogle gives us an historical perspective for our holiday eating customs.

Feast in History

Although some people disparage Thanksgiving as a gluttonous and gormandizing occasion, it seems almost frugal in light of historical feasts. The Romans, for instance, especially in the latter days of the empire, were infamous for their lavish spreads. At one ceremonial occasion, which Julius Caesar attended, the first course consisted of sea urchins, unlimited raw oysters, scallops, cockles, thrushes on asparagus, fattened fowls, and corn fish (both black and white). Then came cockles, mussels, sea nettles, figpeckers, haunches of venison and boar, fattened fowls cooked in pastry, more figpeckers, murex, and purple fish. After that came the main dishes: sow's udders, ducks, boiled teal, hares, roasted fowls, creamed wheat and rolls. The emperor Elagabalus served his guests sausages, made from mollusks, prawns, oysters, squid and crab, as well as camels' feet, the combs from live chickens, tongues of peacocks and nightingales, mullets' livers, the brains of flamingos and thrushes, and the heads of parrots, pheasants and peacocks. Our dinner of turkey, dressing, potatoes, cranberry sauce, and pie seems paltry and mundane in comparison.

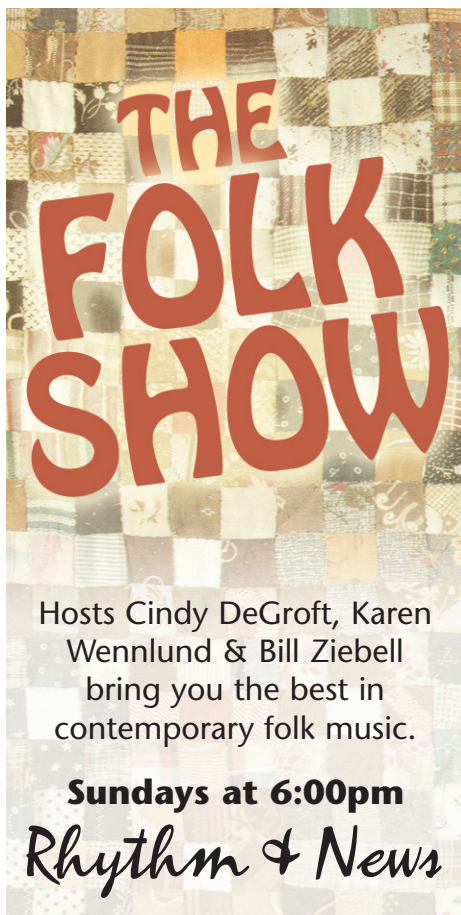

We usually go to some trouble to set a grand table – linen tablecloth and napkins, napkin rings, the best silverware and serving dishes, the good china, crystal wine glasses. But during the Renaissance in Europe, tables were laid with several layers of tablecloths, each to be lifted in turn as new courses were brought in. Napkins were folded in complex shapes such as flames, birds, columns, arches, trophies. At a banquet in honor of Giuliano and Lorenzo de Medici, each napkin enclosed a little bird, which flew away when the guests opened the folds. At one nuptials' banquet in Brussels, the napkins were folded by famed napkin-folder Giovanni Milanese, who pleated the napkins to represent two castles complete with artillery, infantry and artificial fire in recognition of the royal groom's military career. The best sculptors were commissioned to make salt cellars and elaborate sculptural concoctions of sugar, such as those designed by Dorat for a banquet in Paris, depicting – in sugar, remember – the history of the goddess Minerva. At court, the most coveted jobs were those of the carver and of him who unfolded the king's napkin and laid it in his lap.

We might decorate the Thanksgiving table with autumn leaves and tiny pumpkins, but entertainment is usually simply conversation – oh, and football on TV, of course. Renaissance banquets, on the other hand, became theatrical events in themselves, involving masques, processions, and allegories. At the Brussels banquet I just mentioned a masque was performed by “eight aristocratic children escorted by musicians and torchbearers” that ended with the presentation of posies of artificial flowers. Then the tables were cleared for the ball.

Such elaborate dinners are but pictures in history now, not even mimicked by royalty or heads of state, and we in our homes share far simpler feasts. The emphasis of our harvest celebration banquet is not on theater or decoration but on the food. To my way of thinking, that's where it should be. JM

Learning the Laws of Flight and Loss

By Christina Ammon

INSET AT TOP: Pilot's view of Mount Shasta while flying from Whaleback Mountain near Weed, California on the Klamath National Forest. June 18, 2007.

This summer I learned how to fly. Though “humanity’s oldest dream” of flying was realized long ago – when the Montgolfier brothers first sent up a sheep, rooster, a duck and finally two men in their homemade hot air balloon – flight never seems to lose its sense of magic. Back in high school, I learned all about Bernoulli’s Law of Flight – how airplanes can fly because the air above their wing moves faster than the air below. Still, when I peer out the window from an 500,000 pound jetliner, it seems like an impossible phenomenon. Same goes for my paraglider. Looking like nothing more than a bedsheet with strings attached to it, it somehow safely suspends my gravity-bound flesh and blood in the air. Sometimes no amount of rational explanation can negate certain bedrock mysteries like where beings go after they die, or miracle of birth. Flying is one of those eternal phenomena.

I took my first flight at Woodrat Mountain in the Applegate on August 13th of 2007. I woke that summer morning curled up on the front lawn, my nose nestled into my 14-year old dog’s brittle coat. There was a macabre knowing in my stomach. He had hardly walked for three days, and like that first irrefutable arrival of the crisp air of autumn, I sensed an ending.

Like every dog owner, I fiercely believed that mine was the best dog in the world – I loved his lazy ways, the way he could fit three tennis balls in his mouth at once, and even loved his smell, which was grainy and sweet – like fresh bread. Though he was in pain, his spirit stayed strong – even after he couldn’t hike anymore, or play fetch. My vet, Dr. Sarah, explained that certain dogs never lose heart, no matter how much pain they are in. That’s the kind of dog he was.

I called and left a message for Dr. Sarah, then got in the car to drive to Woodrat Mountain. My dog’s unbearable gray stare tugged at me, like it did every time I left to run an errand or to go to work. I thought of staying this time, but felt compelled to show up for my first flight, partly because I needed the distraction, but more than that, I needed the metaphor: flying symbolized the ultimate letting go. Now the two memories – of my first flight and the passing of my dog – glow together like colors at sunset. I can’t separate them. That day the world became vaster, more frightening, and more spectacular than it was the day before.

At Woodrat Mountain the morning sun lit up the oaks and pines with a sharp orange cast. The mountain was popular for paragliding because of the way three valleys terminated at the site, their winds funneling up in just the right way. Our instructor, Kevin Lee, toured us around the burnt grass pasture that was to be our landing zone and we followed him like a line of little fledglings, listening close as he doled out tips: pay attention to the wind sock and look where you want to land. Kevin is tall, competent, rugged, and serene as a pond. He has taught paragliding for twelve years, last year winning “Instructor of the Year” by the United States Hang Gliding and Paragliding Association. It was easy to see why. Intuitive by nature, he never pushed his students out of the nest until he sensed they were ready, seamlessly ushering them into the magic realm of flying. He has taught every kind of person – from the bold adrenaline junkies to the timid – all the while maintaining a humble and guru-like reserve.

We drove up to launch, unpacked our gear, and my cell phone rang. It was Dr. Sarah. “I think it’s time,” I said. My words felt unfamiliar, like they were coming from somewhere else. “I think so too” she replied. The phone line fell winter-silent. She had been helping me think through this for a while. I’d spent the last two years assisting my dog in and out of the car with a ramp, denting my bank account on pain medications, and exhausting my lower back picking up his worn out hips whenever he wanted to stand. “This isn’t working for either one of you,” she once prodded. Finally, I conceded. We made an appointment for an at-home euthanasia at 4:00, after I returned home from my flight.

I set up: unfurled my nylon wing across the ground, untangled the web of lines, buckled into the harness. The bare-boned logistics of set-up comforted me, their simple importance serving as a sort of sleight of hand distracting me from the sadness prying into my chest and my pre-flight jitters.

“Radio Check,” said Kevin, holding his radio close to his mouth. His voice transmitted through the radio attached to my shoulder. As a beginner, I depended on his instruction during flying and landing.

He gave me the go ahead, and I tugged on the lines and the wing inflated with a quick snap. I ran with the full commitment that it takes to launch and in moments felt my body lift away from the hill, away from Kevin. My feet dangled below me, limp and useless. The horizon line became a wide circle, soft wind filled my ears, and the world below took on childlike proportions – the barns, the fences, the cars like little toys I could pick up and rearrange at will.

“Just let go of the steering toggles and let that wing fly,” Kevin’s voice piped in over the radio, snapping me out of my spell. Let the controls go? “Ha ha,” he laughed, “I bet you didn’t expect that.” He wanted me to trust the wing. “Shake your shoulders and enjoy the view,” Kevin instructed. I’d

Global Warming: Regional Solutions

In the spring of this year, Oregon joined the states of Washington, California, Arizona and New Mexico in a compact to reduce greenhouse gas emissions. This ambitious, historic agreement is being ridiculed by some conservatives who argue, ironically, that states just can't do this job. It should be done by — wait for it — the federal government!

The compact “sends a message to Congress and the White House that if they fail to enact policies at the national level to reduce greenhouse gas emissions and do our nation's part to combat global warming, that states will do it on their own,” Oregon Gov. Ted Kulongoski said.

Let's hope the federal government continues dragging its feet on climate change and greenhouse gas emissions until the West Coast effort is well underway. Although greenhouse gas emissions are a worldwide problem, some solutions may be regional.

The effort by these five Western States to reduce greenhouse gas emissions is likely to be successful because of two important ways we are connected.

The first connection is an interesting demographic fact — about 75 percent of Americans who live west of Denver, live in a relatively narrow strip about 100 miles wide on either side of Interstate 5. That concentrates the problem wonderfully.

The second connection is the region's electrical distribution system. The Bonneville Power Administration's North-South Intertie connects the hydroelectric power of Northwest dams and wind farms with the fossil-fuel powerplant complexes in Arizona and New Mexico. This arrangement allows the seasonal export of Northwest hydropower south in the spring and summer to cool the Southwest and the flow of otherwise idle fossil-fuel generated power north to heat the Northwest in winter. Operating regionally, utilities built fewer fossil-fuel fired generating plants than would be needed if the utilities were operating independently. That is one of the reasons why West Coast carbon emissions have remained nearly flat the last 20 years despite soaring population growth.

Coupled with an aggressive commitment to conservation — tougher building codes, more energy efficient appliances and industrial processes to stretch existing electricity supplies — and you have the raw material for a plan that will substantially reduce greenhouse gas emissions from future electric powerplants.

The five states in the new compact extended an invitation to British Columbia. Wyoming and Montana are considering joining the emission control effort. B.C. Hydro has an enormous hydroelectric generating capacity and sells to the American market. Wyoming and Montana have large mine-mouth fossil-fuel powerplants that sell electricity to the Pacific Northwest and the Southwest. This is attractive arrangement for the cap-and-trade emission control envisioned for the region.

Vehicle exhaust is also one of the largest generators of greenhouse gases in the region. West Coast cities — San Diego, Los Angeles, San Francisco, Portland, Seattle and Vancouver, B.C. and smaller points in between where most of the region's population lives — are all prone to thermal inversions that create smog. The situation in California is so acute and affects so many people that the world's auto manufacturers all have “California models” to meet that state's more rigorous emissions standards. As other western states adopt tougher emission standards it will only increase the market for low emission vehicles.

No, this five state compact will not solve the worldwide problem of climate change. But it is a good start in our part of the world. Nine states in the Northeast are already a couple of years ahead of the West Coast in dealing with their fossil fuel-fired powerplants.

These regional compacts are taking potentially effective action now, without waiting for the oil-patch partisans who control the White House or the Southerners in Congress who still really don't believe there is a problem.

With the federal government's present leadership, any federal effort to deal with greenhouse gas emissions is likely to morph into an effort by carbon-emitting industries to water down potentially effective regional initiatives by preempting state laws with weaker federal legislation.

After watching the federal government's response to Iraq, nuclear proliferation, natural disasters like Hurricane Katrina at home and the Bush administration's penchant for reckless deregulation (from banking and airlines to utilities and communications), it is clear that Washington, D.C. has forfeited any claim to be more competent than the states in dealing with greenhouse gas reduction.

What we see emerging is a series of regional experiments in dealing with a very serious problem that will teach us valuable lessons as some things succeed and some fail. After all, diversity is a good thing. ■

Columnist Russell Sadler is living in a Eugene writer's garret working on a short history of Oregon for tourists and newcomers. He can be reached at Russell@russellsadler.org.

Leaf Cutting Bees

Last summer an acquaintance mentioned that he had an eastern redbud in his yard that was being attacked by bees. Nature Notes has two different redbud species in his yard. One, a California or Western redbud is from California. The other, an eastern redbud is from the eastern United States. Both are members of the plant family that peas, beans, black locusts, and wisteria belong. A fruit that splits in two elongated halves to reveal its seeds, called legumes, characterizes the family.

Both species are commonly cultivated for their attractive masses of purplish pink flowers that are produced before their handsome, oval, or heart-shaped leaves. Their hanging legumes persist all winter long. There is something for every season of the year to delight the eye. Eastern redbud is a small tree. Western redbud is a shrub. Western redbud fixes nitrogen with the help of bacteria in root nodules. Opinion is divided on the eastern redbud.

Early spring travelers through the State of Jefferson on Interstate 5 are likely to be familiar with western redbud. Small roadside shrubs covered with small pink blossoms brighten the landscape from about Dunsmuir in the Sacramento canyon south through the foothills to the Great Valley of the Golden State. It grows in foothill woodlands and chaparrals below 3,300 feet elevation.

With just a couple of known individuals, western redbud doesn't make it north of the Klamath River, a fact shared with Bee Balm, a small tree or shrub, also common in California but not Oregon. Nature Notes suspects that they are relicts from a time four to eight thousand years ago, after the great glaciers of the Pleistocene, when the climate was much warmer than it is today. That is when madrone, poison oak, and Garry oak made it all the way to Vancouver Island and the lower mainland in British Columbia, Canada.

Nature Notes' acquaintance noticed that the leaves on his eastern redbud had odd semicircles of tissue cut away by bees. What, Nature Notes was asked, is going on? Nature Notes, never at a loss for an answer, replied, "Leaf-cutting bees."

These chunky solitary bees collect pollen in a special pollen collector under their abdomens rather than on their legs like other bees. There are some 250 California species in the family that includes mason bees, the subject of a previous nature note. One leaf cutting species is metallic, others are dark and hairy, often with a band of whitish or colored abdominal hairs. All are smaller than a honeybee. Pollen is food for adults and baby bees. Leaves are for lining nests.

They like to use preexisting abandoned holes in ground and wood provided by insect and spiders. Once mama bee selects a suitable site she lines her borrow with cut leaves to form as many as 15 cells each with an egg and nectar/pollen mixture. Eggs hatch, pupae form, then hatch into larvae that will emerge as adults the following spring.

Leaf-cutting bees seem to be attracted to plants with leaves of a certain thickness and texture. Rose bush leaves are favorites. Nature Notes hopes that you will not go on a leaf cutter bee rampage if they make your rose foliage unsightly with their carefully crafted circles and semicircles. They do way more good as native pollinators. Like most solitary bees, you must be very mean to them before they sting.

Nature Notes has not noticed leaf cutter bee activity in the redbuds of his Darwinian garden. If he does, he will just enjoy them, as he does his mason and carpenter bees going about their business, as good bees should.

pose questions and let listeners expound on their views on those topics – which can mean that we broadcast information that is not necessarily derived from experts and/or not necessarily factually correct. Some have observed that the breadth of callers in that first hour, which in 1994 was perhaps more accurately a reflection of the breadth of the program's audience and service area, no longer as fully reflects the diversity of the program's audience.

Those, also, seem to be topics worth pondering.

While the Jefferson Exchange may sound "simple" on the air, it is actually a large, very complex and expensive undertaking for a station our size. JPR has been strongly committed to the Jefferson Exchange and we remain committed to effectively pursuing the program's goals. We are, therefore, now productively engaged in reviewing the best way of achieving those goals.

These are not simple questions – and certainly not ones answered quickly. We've been trying out a number of different ideas on the Jefferson Exchange and will continue to do so in coming months. To allow ourselves to do so, we've decided to move past the summer experience of having a multiplicity of hosts on the air each week, and engage a temporary, but daily, host for a six month period. Since my column must be written 4-5 weeks ahead of its appearance in your mailbox, I am writing in September while a Search Committee is soliciting and reviewing applications for that temporary host assignment. By the time this column appears, however, the result of their work will have already been announced and a host will already have been selected for the period running through next March.

During the next six months we'll continue to evaluate different ideas about the program. We intend to use the time productively and creatively to reassess the Jefferson Exchange with the intention of then launching a permanent host recruitment effort for the program whose vision we have collectively shaped by that time.

When we launched the Jefferson Exchange in 1994, we faced no shortage of skeptics. Some thought that it was an effort doomed to failure because it was to be heard on AM stations, which were generally considered to be "also rans" in the media world. Others didn't believe there was sufficient interest to warrant the air time or expense. Some observed that there couldn't possibly be enough callers in our small region to make the program relevant and interesting. Since listeners can necessarily better understand and appreciate programs they've already heard better than ideas for programs not yet broadcast, that's entirely understandable. It also makes the concept of change – a necessary reality in life – more challenging in radio.

We're thinking about those things – change, goals and possibilities – and about the best way of serving your interests. And, as the Jefferson Exchange has entered a time of change, we're particularly focused on creatively exploring the program's potential. JM come to love his voice, the way it swaddled me like my first baby blanket. “Just shake your shoulders out and enjoy the view.”

I practiced a few turns, tugging at the right and left brake lines and carving “S” patterns in the sky. No thoughts, just awe, pure sensation — like falling in love. As the ground neared, I pulled the brake lines, and stepped easily onto the ground like off of a small curb. My feet woke up again. Landing has a particular satisfaction, like a period at the end of a perfect sentence.

I decided to learn paragliding last July. My friend Allison and I started together. Both in our late-20s early 30s — we had arrived at the age where you see a fork in the road and pursuing certain types of adventures seems more urgent, in the event that domestic urges start to arise. So, we had been chasing adventures as if they were balloons vanishing into the sky: we had wrestled our food away from bears in the Teton, ran rivers, and skied the peaks and ridges of the backcountry. Paragliding was our next frontier.

So, on the sharp sunny mornings of July, we would drive out to meet Kevin at the small training hill at the far edge of Emigrant Lake. As we bumped along the road toward the site, coffees in hand, we were filled with a huge sense of wellbeing. Already prone to giggling, with paragliding life became suddenly more exciting, and now we laughed harder about everything. Each morning we’d see the same blue heron standing like an elegant bare branch on the end of a sandbar. “He must be watching over us,” Allison suggested, “He’s a sort of flying totem.” She named him Bob.

During those mornings on the training hill, Bob’s blue gaze watching over, we learned how to control the wing on the ground and got our first small feelings of flight — the thrilling tug of the glider which would occasionally pluck us a few feet in the air. Kevin coached us on the radio, teaching us how to slow the glider and then return to the ground feather soft. After lessons, we would drive back to town with astonished smiles, and eat lunch at the Co-op salad bar. Standing in line to fill our plates with spinach leaves and garbanzo beans, we felt let in on a secret that no one else knew. Like in the quick hands of a magician, we had been transformed from one thing into another — from simple handkerchiefs into doves.

Paragliding never occurred to me as a sport to pursue. Many paragliders will reminisce about magical childhood dreams of flying, reading aviation books when they were young. Bill Kaelin, a local pilot, once said to me, “If you played with kites as a kid, if you jumped off the roof with an umbrella thinking it might slow you down, if you wrapped a towel around your neck like a cape and ran around, this sport might be for you.” Not me. I was too busy making mud pies and operating on earthworms.

Paragliding came into my life as a chance to begin something new, as a way to offset a bunch of things that crashed all at once: aside from releasing my dog, I’d lost my affordable apartment, ended a three year relationship, and quit a great job. I was burned out on. But loss was a great purifier, and what was left sparkled. Suddenly, I just wanted to enjoy each thing.

Paragliding is considered one of the purest forms of flight. Unlike an airplane, with its engine noise, its many gauges, its fiberglass and artificial air, in a paraglider the pilot can feel the air of her face and the sensation of flying actually enters the body. While sitting in an airplane can feel like a long wait at a doctor’s office, paragliding is a singular experience, a transformation.

Paragliding has a reputation for being an extreme sport, it is actually much safer than it appears. The sport developed alongside hang gliding in the seventies and in this period of development, accidents happened on a routine basis. Since then, new technologies have made for more safe and reliable paragliders. Teaching techniques have also evolved greatly and the former trial-by-fire mindset of throwing people off cliffs has been replaced by a methodic rating system that certifies pilots. In the right hands, flying a paraglider can be as safe as flying any aircraft.

While paragliding is popular in Europe where over 400,000 people fly, in the United States the sport remains an obscure niche of around 5,000. The people that take it up are a diverse group ranging in age and gender. At Woodrat Mountain, a girl started when she was 15 and was so enamored by the sport that she was reportedly skipping school to fly. Now her mother is learning the sport.

If there is something in common with the people that pursue paragliding, it is likely that they have all examined the role of risk in their life. Though paragliding can be safe, it certainly looks and feels dangerous and inevitably spawns some meditation on death. On the whole, people who fly are the sort of people who have realized that death often comes in random and mundane ways – like crossing the street – and that life is best lived fully, no matter the cost.

On the afternoon of my first flight at Woodrat Mountain, I returned home to my dog with steaks and dread expanding in my stomach. The Dr. Sarah was scheduled to come in a couple of hours, so I curled up with my dog, stroked his soft ears, and fed him bites of steak. Occasionally he’d wag his tail in response. I didn’t want to distress him, so I tried hard not to cry.

Dr. Sarah arrived and sitting on the lawn, explained the procedure. I held his head in my lap and whispered “good boy” over and over in my happiest tones. This was exactly the way I wanted him to leave the world – in my arms, knowing he was the best dog. She gave him the shot, his head fell heavy in my lap. In that moment that space on that simple suburban lawn became hallowed ground.

I buried my dog at the farm I had been working at for 8 years, underneath a walnut tree that I’d deemed the “best place on earth” for its arching branches that provided shade in August. Friends arrived to help dig the hole and to drink wine, to place big sunflowers on his grave and to celebrate his life. The whole day felt poem-perfect – full of bleak and beautiful emotions and lovely contradictions: tears and exhilaration, gratitude and grief. Flying up 1,000 feet in the in the sky, and returning home to dig a deep hole in the earth.

In the following weeks I continued my flying lessons returning out to the training hill to practice my ground handling. One day I took a swim out into the lake, feeling the coolness of the water hold me in my fresh grief. A heron flew low over my head – Bob maybe, in perfect flight form. Protecting me. I tend not to read into the world this way, believing things are for the most part random. But certain coincidences are striking. Like why sometimes do losses come all at once? Does the universe try to teach us lessons?

After my dog’s death, my thinking overall had become less rational. I still saved the crusts of my morning toast for him, still stepped over his spot on the rug as if he were still there sleeping. At night, I covered his grave with blankets to keep him warm. I felt consoled reading writer Joan Didion’s recent book about the year following the death of her husband. She speaks of the strange habits that persist after such a crisis, founded in the irrational belief that the deceased is not really deceased, that they are just away for a short spell. Didion calls this “magical thinking.”

I still wake some mornings, reach down to pet him wondering how he could possibly be gone. Where did he go? He was buried in front of my eyes. I tossed dirt on his body with my own hands. All things die. Like Bernoulli’s law of flight, there were rational explanations for this phenomena. Still, I felt that there had to be more. Was he really merely a body that became part of the walnut tree where he was buried? Part of the squirrels that ate the walnuts?

“He’s up there somewhere,” said my friend Mary Pat, standing near his grave on the day that he died. She gazed upward with her sky blue eyes. “He’s flying around.” She winked at me. “And now you fly with him.” It was interesting that people often explained death in this way: as souls, flying up in the air, into the sky.

CLAYFOLK: A Ceramic Tradition

By Leslie Lee

A sure sign of Fall in Southern Oregon is the Annual Clayfolk Pottery Show and Sale which will be held at the Medford Armory on Stewart Ave. November 16, 17 and 18. The event, now in its thirty-second year, will begin at 4pm on Friday with opening night festivities including live music, traditionally by one of the area's great high school jazz bands, and closing at 9pm. Saturday hours are 10am to 7pm and Sunday 10am to 4pm.

This will be Clayfolk's third year at the Armory and those who have attended the sale since its inception have told the group how pleased they are to see their favorite ceramic artists, and buy their wares, in a comfortable and well lighted venue. The show was last housed in the horse barn at the Expo Center in Central Point.

The annual fall Clayfolk sale was started by a small group of about 15 potters looking for a way to have a Holiday Sale open to the public. One of Clayfolk's founding members, Nancy Mason, has been credited for keeping the show alive year after year by relentlessly searching out vacant storefronts that could be used for the price of utilities. "Our little show was welcome in various malls in the Medford area" said Bonnie

Morgan of Southern Oregon Pottery Supply. "We started in the rabbit shack at the Fairgrounds where the Southgate Shopping Center is now and one year we were in Chuck-E-Cheez's old space in Poplar Square. We set our wares out on banquet tables... there weren't individual booths or displays like there are in the current show. Each year we would run an ad in the paper to announce our location and we started building a mailing list." Ray Foster, Clayfolk's long time treasurer and head of the Art Department at South Medford High School, remembers the old ledgers from the show's first ten years showing early revenues of about $8,000. Today Clayfolk's mailing list is several thousand names and sales have averaged $125,000 since the move to the Medford Armory.

Clayfolk's annual show has always been well attended due to the wealth of ceramic art available for holiday shopping. The range of styles and artistic vision presented is broad, ranging from sculpture to dinnerware, and made by hobbyists to nationally known professionals. A central check- CONTINUED ON PAGE 17

The Death of Desktop Software

Traditional desktop software is dying and I can't wait for it to be completely gone and turned into a distant memory like the 5 ¼" floppy disk. No more installation CDs and 20-character product keys for "activation". No more software piracy. No more software updates, and—best of all—no more dreaded upgrades. Seriously, do we really need a new version of Microsoft Office as badly as Microsoft's shareholders do? Probably not.

One day we'll likely look back upon this era of desktop software with the same disdain as we do the DOS operating system. (My apologies to the two or three people out there who revel in the glory days of the command line prompt and those 5 ¼" floppy disks.) Soon we'll access our software via the Internet. Rather than installing, we'll log on and launch. Software will no longer be a product that you buy and install. It'll be a service that you use online.

This isn't a new concept. "Software as a service," or SaaS, has been around for several years now. Under the SaaS model, software vendors develop web-based software applications that customers access via the Internet. According to Gartner, Inc., a technology research and advisory company, worldwide revenue for SaaS will hit $5.1 billion this year, which will be a one year gain of 21 percent. Furthermore, Gartner predicts that by 2011, one-fourth of all new business software will be delivered as a web-based service.

Earlier this year, Internet heavyweight, Google, entered the SaaS playing field with "Google Apps." Google Apps is a web-based office software suite that includes word processing, spreadsheet, presentation, email, calendar and web-authoring applications. In other words, Google Apps offers the many of the same basic applications you get with Microsoft Office—but at a fraction of the cost. Microsoft Office retails at $400. Google Apps is free unless you want to spend $50/year for the "Premier Edition", which includes a control panel for managing domain and user accounts and the ability to integrate 3rd party applications. Google is also offering the equivalent of its Premier Edition for free to schools and registered non-profit organizations.

As a lone end-user, you can get most all of Google Apps for free. In fact, I'm writing this month's column using Google Apps' word processing application. When I'm finished, I'll publish the document so that my editor can access and read it online. In terms of features, Google's online word processing application pales in comparison to Microsoft Word. But I'm a fairly simple guy who doesn't need a lot of features. Even the 12 fonts that are offered by Google's word processing application is overkill for me. I'm more of a one-font kind of guy. If I wanted to, I could create a spreadsheet or a presentation using Google's applications. Again, these online software applications do not have nearly as many bells and whistles as Microsoft Excel and PowerPoint, but they get the job done for creating basic documents.

The best—and worst—of Google's service offering is that it's all online. Having it online makes it the best because I can access my documents from any Internet-connected computer in the world. The problem is that these web-based applications are useless when I'm not connected to the Internet. Like when users are on an airplane, for example. This isn't much of a problem for me because I don't travel much and when I do I tend to be on vacation and don't want to be taking my work with me anyway. This is an obvious problem, however, for corporate folks who spend a lot of their time working on the go. But limited connectivity while on-the-go is only a temporary problem. One day, the concept of being "offline" will be as distant a memory as those 5 ¼" floppy disks and we'll wonder how we ever survived this era of not being constantly connected to the Net.

Google Apps and the emerging SaaS market are threats to Microsoft's dominance in the desktop software market. Microsoft doesn't like competition and, based on its track record, tends to either buy or crush its competitors, choosing whichever tactic is in the best interest of its shareholders. But with a net income of $3 billion this past year, a skyrocketing stock value, and its powerful position in the Internet economy, Google has become too expensive to be bought out and too big to be crushed.

Microsoft has been left with no choice but to compete, which it has been doing. Well, sort of anyway. Microsoft recently rolled out the beta version of Microsoft Office Live Workspace, which allows users to store and access "up to 1000+ Microsoft Office documents... from almost any computer with a Web browser," according to Microsoft's Office Live website. Like Google Apps, Microsoft's Office Live Workspace service is free.

However, unlike Google Apps, it doesn't enable users to actually create those documents using online applications. In other words, Microsoft Office Live Workspace is not a true SaaS offering like Google Apps. You still need to purchase Microsoft Office. This shouldn't come as a big surprise to anyone. Microsoft has a lot (of revenue) to lose if it stopped churning out and selling new versions of Microsoft Office.

Microsoft has a lot more to lose though if it doesn't create and effectively market a true SaaS offering for Microsoft Office. When it comes to technology, a paradigm shift is always occurring as new technologies are created and customer demands and expectations change to create new market opportunities. Technology companies that hold on to

NPR Biography: Jamie Tarabay

Since December 2005, Jamie Tarabay, 32, has lived in an undisclosed location in Baghdad and been a familiar, knowledgeable journalistic voice about Iraq to more than 10 million Americans weekly as NPR News' Bureau Chief in the war zone. In January 2007, she was part of the NPR News team that won the prestigious Alfred I. duPont-Columbia University Award for coverage of Iraq, the only news organization so recognized.

Tarabay reports for NPR News programs including the newsmagazines Morning Edition, All Things Considered and Day to Day, and also provides content for the news site www.NPR.org. Working 18-hour-plus days, Tarabay covers the region's breaking news and issues, but she also brings the war to a personal, human scale through compelling storytelling – recounting experiences of individual Iraqis dealing with the crisis around them. Recently, she reported on three Shiite sisters living together in a dangerous Sunni neighborhood who are secretly moving to another location but facing the difficult choice of leaving their family home forever or possibly becoming casualties of sectarian violence. Earlier this year, she provided the account of a NPR Baghdad bureau Iraqi staff member whose father was kidnapped, and the complicated, ill-fated attempt to rescue him.

For the past seven years, Tarabay has been a foreign correspondent covering – and living in – some of the world's highest-profile regions of conflict. In September 2000, she joined AP as a correspondent in Jerusalem, arriving 10 days before the second intifada erupted. During her work there and from the Palestinian territories, she was recognized for her journalism covering the people caught in the strife. As an AP correspondent, she also reported from Southeast Asia, Jordan, Lebanon and Egypt. She has been traveling to Iraq as a journalist since 2003. Tarabay's book about her AP experiences, A Crazy Occupation: Eyewitness to the Intifada, was published in Australia in 2005 by Allen & Unwin and became available in the U.S. in 2006.

Tarabay is one of the few female Western journalists who have made a career as a war correspondent in Iraq. She is Australian by birth, Lebanese by heritage (having lived for three years as a child in Beirut during the Syrian bombings and intra-Lebanese fighting, when she spent nights with her family in shelters). Tarabay also grew up in Sydney and Berlin. She has a B.A. in Government and French from the University of Sydney, and is fluent in Arabic and French. While not living in Baghdad, she makes her home in Paris. TM old paradigms in the midst of a paradigm shift are destined to get into trouble. Bill Gates perhaps knows this better than anyone who has survived and thrived in the shark tank of the commercial software industry. Microsoft itself was born amidst a paradigm shift and emerged as one of the wealthiest and most influential technology companies of the 20th century. If you had said back in the early 1980s that Microsoft would one day be a bigger player than IBM, you would have been ridiculed and laughed out of the room. Many a tech pundit has decreed the death of Microsoft over the years every time a new challenger came onto the scene to potentially threaten Microsoft's hegemony and strong market position. Whether that's the case with the emergence of Google is doubtful. But there's one thing I'm certain of: the death of desktop software is underway and the paradigm shift to SaaS is imminent.

Each weeknight, on the News & Information Service, take a trip around the globe with As It Happens. Hosted by veteran journalists Barbara Budd and Carol Off, As It Happens is a production of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation (CBC). For more than 35 years, using the simplest of tools - the telephone - this current affairs program has explored the heart of a story, whether it's happening in the streets of Belgrade, the dockyards of Vancouver, the boardrooms of Bay Street, or the kitchens of Paris. As It Happens gets its stories from "the horse's mouth" - securing interviews with world leaders, rabble-rousers, bingo callers and deposed dictators. The show has a soft-spot for "characters" and never turns its nose up at something wild, weird or wacky. And, on the complex and troubling stories of the day, As It Happens searches for greater understanding in the story behind the story. As It Happens airs weeknights at 7pm on JPR's News and Information Service.

Volunteer Profile: Honey Marchetti

I grew up in Pittsburgh listening to my older sister's music, top 40s popular music served up by Porky Chedwick, your Platter Pushin' Papa, and Young Mr. (Chuck) Brinkman on the teen stations, WAMO and KQV. When I got to high school, I listened to Jim Quinn on "13Q." Later, my husband and I listened to Jack Bogut on the nation's first radio station, KDKA. Eventually, we tuned in to Pittsburgh's public broadcasting radio station, WQED, to be wakened by Jim Cunningham on the morning show, Sleepers Awake. Here in Ashland, we begin our days with First Concert, hosted by Don Matthews on JPR.

Last January, I was thumbing through the Jefferson Monthly when I came across a plea for volunteers who were conversant in classical music and wanted to be on the air at JPR. Well!

If I had to describe my level of musical expertise, I would say that in any group of ten randomly selected people, I'd rank in the top two. And, in any group of ten classical music buffs, I'd finish last. So, armed with the level of confidence this would inspire and a fair amount of hope and determination, I volunteered to be on the air on the Classics & News Service of Jefferson Public Radio. At least, I could say with absolute certainty that I wanted to be on the air. In fact, I've been dreaming of being a disc jockey since I was seven.

Rhythm & News Highlights

Marian McPartland's Piano Jazz

Nov 4 • Robert Glasper

Pianist and composer Robert Glasper is a young and powerful voice on the jazz scene. With technique to burn and a deep melodic intellect, he seamlessly blends elements from hip-hop, alternative rock, and jazz to create his own unique and dynamic style. He kicks off the show with his original tune "Rise and Shine," and jams with McPartland on Herbie Hancock's "Dolphin Dance."

Nov 11 • Anat Fort

Israeli born pianist, composer, and arranger Anat Fort is classically trained but is also well studied in jazz improvisation. A prolific composer, her musical words come together in elegant and often intense original tunes. She performs several originals, including "Just Now" and "Something about Camels," before joining McPartland on "Softly As In A Morning Sunrise."

Nov 18 • Michael Kocour

Pianist and educator Michael Kocour spent years on the Chicago jazz scene, leading his own trio and playing high profile gigs with the likes of Dizzy Gillespie and the Chicago Symphony. Now he's arrived at the University of Arizona, where he serves as the director of jazz studies. Kocour talks about the transition from gigging to teaching and joins McPartland on "Ask Me Now" and "I Should Care."

Nov 25 • Stefano Bollani

Italian pianist Stefano Bollani stretches the limits of imagination with improvisations that can range from quirky to transcendent. Virtuoso technique and a keen harmonic sense bolster Bollani's improvisations, which are influenced as much by Charlie Parker and Oscar Peterson as Prokofiev and Zappa. He performs an original

Volunteer From p. 18

I trained with Don Matthews and learned how to put together a five-hour broadcast. First, I select the music which involves a trip to the JPR CD library, where I look for classical pieces which vary by style, musical instruments, composer's dates, and country of origin, so the show will have an interesting texture. Then, I check to make sure the listeners didn't hear the music recently. Of course, the selections need to fit in the time available between station breaks for identification, weather reports, and features like Earth & Sky and As It Was. I've learned to verify the pronunciations of performer's and conductor's names. I've also learned about barcarolles, ballades, and Bach's sons, so I can share snippets of information with my listeners.

JPR radio hosts announce upcoming programs and make Public Service Announcements on the air. Operating the equipment is fun; programming the show is intellectual; and listening to the music is pleasant, but for me, actually visiting with listeners over the air waves is the best part of radio announcing. Every time I open the microphone, I feel a rush of excitement. The audience hears about the upcoming Metropolitan Opera broadcast, the rummage sale at a local church, or some interesting tidbit about a piece of classical music I'm about to play, from me. It's a dream come true.

The End of an Era

This past summer, we witnessed the passing of two giants in the opera world: Beverly Sills on July 2nd and Luciano Pavarotti on September 6th. One could argue endlessly about their merits as singers but what is undeniable is that both of them, in their own way, opened up the rarefied world of opera to millions of people who otherwise might have been unaware of this form of artistic expression.

In the interest of full disclosure, I must admit that I am a fan, having studied to become an opera singer and even achieving some very modest success. Being on the inside, I am aware of many talented and lesser known singers not on the public radar, but I am intrigued with how these two reached people beyond the small sub-set of those of us who listen on a regular basis.

Beverly Sills made her professional debut at the age of 4 when she appeared on a Saturday morning radio program as "Bubbles" Silverman and a year later sang in a film in which she appeared for the first time as Beverly Sills. In 1939 at the age of 10, she was the winner of a weekly contest, Major Bow's Amateur Hour on CBS radio and was subsequently asked to join his Capitol Family Hour and appeared frequently thereafter.

In 1945, she made her professional stage debut as Patience in a Gilbert & Sullivan touring company and credited that experience with developing her comic timing. In 1947, she made her operatic debut as the Spanish gypsy Frasquita in Carmen and beginning in 1951, appeared as Violetta in La Traviata and Micaela in Carmen. In 1953, she made her San Francisco Opera debut and two years later debuted with the New York City Opera to critical praise.

Sills married in 1956 and had two children; Meredith (Muffy) who was profoundly deaf, and Peter, Jr. (Bucky) who was severely mentally disabled. For the next several years, she restricted her performing schedule to care for her two children.

Throughout the 1960s and '70s, she had many successes with the New York City Opera and with numerous recordings and at about this time, she made her first appearance on television as a talk-show guest and she was a hit. (An opera fan who was talent coordinator for the series Virginia Graham's Girl Talk persuaded the producer to put her on the air). Sills shone as a guest in her many appearances with Dick Cavett, Merv Griffin, Dinah Shore and Johnny Carson for whom she even substituted as guest host of the Tonight Show. She also appeared numerous times on the Carol Burnett Show and became dear friends with Burnett and she even appeared on The Muppet Show. It was these many appearances which made her an important force for popularizing opera more than any other singer of her era.

Sills was also an arts administrator following her retirement from the stage in 1980 in various guises until 2005 and she lent her celebrity to further her charity work for the prevention and treatment of birth defects.

Luciano Pavarotti began singing at age 9 with his father in the small local church choir. He had an early interest in pursuing a career in soccer but his mother encouraged him to train as a teacher. He taught elementary school for two years but began to become more interested in music so his father made a deal with him: he could live at home until he was 30 rent-free and if by then he had not succeeded, he would have to earn a living by any means necessary.

Pavarotti began serious study at 19 and a year later experienced his first success as a member of Choral Rossini which won first prize at a competition in Wales. He later said it was the most important experience of his life and inspired him to turn pro. During his years of study, he worked part-time as a teacher and when he failed at that, an insurance salesman. He started singing in small, regional opera houses but very early in his career, debuted in La Bohème at the Vienna State Opera in 1963. In the same year, he made his Royal Opera House debut, replacing an indisposed Guiseppe di Stefano, again singing Rodolfo.

It was an early connection with Joan Sutherland that helped propel him to eventual stardom. She had been seeking a young tenor taller than herself to take on tour in Australia and the two sang some 40 performances over 2 months. Soon after, he performed at La Scala with his childhood friend Mirelli Freni (both of their mothers had worked at the same cigar factory) in Zeffirelli's production of La Bohème conducted by Herbert von Karajan who had requested him.

By now, his career was well under way when he appeared at Covent Garden in 1966 in Donizetti's La Fille du Regiment and it was his performance in that opera that would earn him the title of "King of the High-C's". That same role was the vehicle for his debut at the Metropolitan Opera in 1972 where the crowd went wild with his nine effortless high C's and he was given a record 17 curtain calls.

Pavarotti began his frequent television appearances with the first Live at the MET telecast in 1977 and also became a frequent guest on the talk-show circuit. As with Sills, the medium showed him to be a hit for audiences who were charmed by him, bringing his considerable vocal gifts to a wider public.

In the mid 1980s, he began to sing for larger and larger audiences with a performance in the Great Hall in China for 10,000. In 1990 his "Nessun dorma" became the theme song for the BBC-TV coverage of the World Cup in Italy followed by the first of the "Three Tenors" concerts on the eve of the World Cup final with Plácido Domingo and José Carreras and the resulting recording became the biggest selling Classical record of all time.

Throughout the 1990s, Pavarotti appeared in many well-attended outdoor concerts, including his concert in London's Hyde Park for 150,000 and on the Great Lawn of Central Park in New York for 500,000 while millions watched on television. These concerts as well as his many performances on television made him the most famous opera singer of our time.

Both Sills and Pavarotti reached millions through appearances on TV which seemed to endear both them to everyday people by virtue of their personal charm and their vocal gifts and it seems that they leave no successors to that broad appeal. While there are certainly singers as talented and perhaps as charming, the timing of their careers and their personal charisma created a special place in the society at large, beyond opera and their passing surely marks the end of an era. JM

Molly Tinsley

Talk About Dark Comedy

It must be so tempting to set Moliere's seventeenth century play Tartuffe in the contemporary United States. Here we have this man, Orgon, affluent and respected as father, husband, and loyal subject, who falls under the spell of a seeming religious fanatic, Tartuffe. Utterly besotted, he bestows daughter, wife, house, and fortune on this con artist, not to mention his own heart and soul.

In his greed and deceit, Tartuffe seems the direct ancestor of televangelists today, who gull the hungry masses out of millions while practicing the very "sins" they preach against. Then there's our secular culture, where any self-appointed expert can become a guru overnight, enshrined by our collective longing for guidance and certainty. Isn't that what drives Orgon's dependence on Tartuffe? He's stumbling through a mid-life crisis and needs a crutch. The parallels abound.

So I imagine this brainstorming session, back when director Peter Amster took on this season's production of the play at the Oregon Shakespeare Festival: dizzied by all the possibilities for modern relevance, he decides they are simply too obvious. "Let's just do it—a la Moliere," he finally resolves, "pretending it's the court of Louis XIV and we're entertaining the King." The resulting production is splendid in its physical polish, but the modern mind may miss a certain psychological punch. You can see it if you hurry—its closing performance in the Bowmer is October 27.

The gorgeous period gowns designed by Mara Blumenfeld could turn a King's mistress in her grave, while Richard Hay has created an elegantly simple set—a drawing room opening on a smaller dining area upstage. Appropriate to this world of tricky appearances, angled floortiles, walls, and windows give the illusion of perspective and depth. The second act inverts the arrangement—Orgon's persistent lunacy has moved us through the looking-glass. Now the dining area opens on the drawing room upstage, and its table, which will invite the slaking of the lower appetite, dominates our view.

In a tour-de-force performance, Richard Elmore pushes Orgon's foolishness to the edge of credulity. Rather than a man sensing the first stages of decline, his Orgon is well into feebleness and dementia. Following his first entrance he is stripped of wig and dress clothes before our eyes, down to a hairless, pallid figure in house slippers, a mollusk without its shell. When he isn't dithering at his family, he is gasping and raging, his voice thinned to a squeak, making threats of violence that everyone ignores. Meanwhile, of course, he dotes on Tartuffe, witnessing his sophistries with the devoted gaze of a political wife standing by her miscreant husband.

Linda Alper as the outspoken maid Dorine is appropriately savvy and sardonic. Her voluptuousness and vitality, however, seem to have sucked the air from Suzanne Irving's Elmire, whose sang froid never seems to vary a degree.

As Orgon's younger, second wife, Elmire needs energy if single-handed she is to exploit Tartuffe's sexual interest and entrap him. Indeed faced with her husband's indifference and abandonment, her motives in encouraging Tartuffe's flirtation could become comically conflicted, her responses to it, more experimental, less bored.

Anthony Heald as Tartuffe creates his best moments when he can't suppress a sneaky, boyish smile at his successful discombobulation of Orgon's household. He's like a kid dismantling a toy—satisfying his curiosity and taking pleasure in destruction. His attempts to seduce Elmire seem to spring from these same impulses rather than adult lust—he treats her like a lollipop—and the two never really generate a credible heat or sense of risk.

What's most interesting about Amster's production of Tartuffe is the new translation by Ranjit Bolt (2002) that replaces the familiar, witty couplets of Richard Wilbur's.

Bolt has clipped one foot from Wilbur's five-beat line, coming up with a spritely iambic tetrameter, fast and loose in several senses of those words. Bolt updates Wilbur's idiom and opts for concrete, Anglo-Saxon diction (including one cameo appearance by the f-word) over Wilbur's more Latinate erudition. In condemning the moral hypocrisy of the neighbors, for example, Wilbur's Dorine explains, "By talking up their neighbor's indiscretions, they seek to camouflage their own transgressions." Bolt's Dorine keeps it simple: "Shame's not so shameful if it's shared; two sets of dirty sheets compared don't look as dirty as one set."

After Orgon informs his daughter Mariane she must wed Tartuffe, Wilbur's docile ingénue deflects Dorine's pressure to resist: "What good would it do? A father's power is great." Bolt's modernized girl has this to say: "Oppose my father? In that mood? Fat chance. You saw his attitude." Later Orgon's son Damis overhears Tartuffe's initial overtures to Elmire and wants to run to Orgon with the information. Wilbur's Damis argues, "This is my chance, and I deserve to lose it if, for one moment, I hesitate to use it." Bolt splits the line, and suspends the rhyme, to suggest a more graphic image: "I won't be deaf when vengeance calls—not now I've got him by the ..."

As often as the rhymes in this translation pop pleasant surprises and relieve longish speeches, they also make it easy to skate over the play's disturbing substance. Oddly enough, Bolt's version, unlike Wilbur's, does award Orgon an epiphany once Tartuffe is unmasked: "I have been an absolute moron," he realizes. Elmore's Orgon chooses to shrug off the moment of truth and deliver his last words unchastened, with the same obtuse impatience he started with.

Both the OSF production and the Bolt translation seem determined to keep Tartuffe light, but Moliere's darkly comic vision prevails anyway, of a muddled, ungenerous world, saved only by the last minute, god-like intervention of the king.

Playwright Molly Tinsley taught literature and creative writing at the Naval Academy for twenty years. Her latest book is a collection of stories, Throwing Knives (Ohio State University Press). It was the recipient of the Oregon Book Award for fiction in 2001.

Sunflowers

PETER WARSHAW

Practicing his art, Vincent gathered flowers, arranged them in an ordinary vase on an ordinary day, then removed them one by one onto a small canvas where they remain, practicing his art.

Now we may never look upon a sunflower or hear that yellow word or think of sunflowers in shadowy winter without a burst of Arles sun to melt the tedium of another ordinary day.

Peter Warshaw's poems have appeared in Commonweal, Sewanee Review, and Hesperides. He lives in Ashland, Oregon.

A Scene in Passing

MIKE GULLICKSON

I was dreaming of being old while
You were of a constant age beside me.
In this dream the country changed in clicks and flutters
from spring to summer, fall to winter and back again—
while I sat stunned
breathing months away.
The leaf that fell on my hand
rotted into dust
when I bent to look at it, where it blew through an open window
I thought I felt a quick chill and a snowflake
but my hand was dry.

Night and day were strobed to my sight, it was either day with a flash of dark or night with a flash of light.

I was dreaming of being old.
The sound of the years passing
was a mad music,
only the slow expansion and contraction of the house and the forming and falling of ice on the windows
was identifiable.
Otherwise the sound was as gray as my hair.
As the pace slowed
I was dreaming of being old and could not pull myself awake.

Stories from the State of Jefferson

Eric Allen, Jr.: Southern Oregon Journalist

Maryann Mason

In 1985, Eric Allen, Jr., the prize-winning editor of Medford, Oregon's Mail Tribune, retired. His journalism career spanned 44 years, earning him the title, "Dean of Oregon Editors." Allen's career has been compared to that of his father, Eric Allen, Sr., who founded and served as dean of the University of Oregon's School of Journalism. Allen's mother was a nationally renowned poet, novelist, and playwright.

At the end of World War II, Allen was the assistant to Republican Governor Earl Snell. After Governor Snell died in a plane crash, Allen accepted the job as city editor in Medford, population 17,000. Soon he became managing editor and editor.

In 1976 Allen accepted the Voorhies Award for the Mail Tribune. The paper, which had obtained a court order for media access to crime information, was honored for its opposition to the short-lived law preventing access. Allen, who wrote 12 to 16 editorials a week, supported many of his passions: land use planning laws, the Elk Creek dam, the Human Rights Council, and the best candidates from both the Democrat and Republican parties. His editorials on hand gun control even earned him death threats.

A year after Allen retired, he died at the young age of 66.

Constable George J. Prescott

Craig Stillwell

On the eastern flank of Medford, Oregon, Roxy Ann Peak rises more than 2000-feet over the valley. Since the late-1930s, a city park there has given visitors spectacular views of Southern Oregon. The park is named after Constable George J. Prescott, who was slain in 1933, culminating one of the most violent periods in Jackson County politics.

A longtime Medford resident, the 63-year-old Prescott was a well-liked and respected police officer. In 1929, as a leader in the Lions Club, he helped purchase 240 acres near the summit of Roxy Ann, which was deeded to the city. The next year, Medford acquired another 1,500 acres from the federal government. But development of a park stalled during the economic depression of the early 1930s.

In early 1933, Prescott investigated a theft of election ballots from the county courthouse. When Llewellyn Banks, a failed orchardist and newspaper owner, was implicated in this crime, a grand jury indicted him, and on the morning of March 16, 1933, Prescott appeared at Banks' door with an arrest warrant. Without warning, Banks shot Prescott with a deer rifle, killing the officer instantly.

From 1933 until World War II, young men of the Civilian Conservation Corps developed the park that honors Constable Prescott's sacrifice.

The Marshfield Sun Printing Museum

Shirley Nelson

In 1891, law partners J. M. Siglin and William Luse decided to publish an independent newspaper in Coos County, Oregon. Luse's son Jesse produced the first issue. Thus began Jesse's fifty-three-year career as the Marshfield Sun's only editor, as well as its writer, publisher, salesman, and pressman.

The newspaper moved to its own building in 1911. Jesse Luse died at age 75 in 1944, the year Marshfield became Coos Bay. The building was closed for nearly thirty years. Inside, the newspaper plant was intact. But the building itself—a five-sided wooden structure made to fit its small lot—had problems.

In 1975 a storm pushed the building off its wooden foundation, just as the City of Coos Bay had agreed to purchase it. The building was placed on a concrete foundation. Leaks and rotten siding were addressed—though improper siding was applied, which also rotted and was later replaced. Finally, in 2004, a third restoration was completed.

Today the Marshfield Sun Printing Museum is open Memorial Day through Labor Day, Tuesday through Saturday afternoons. Visitors see pioneer printing equipment and actual editions of the paper, in memory of the man who served the longest as editor of a weekly newspaper published in Oregon.

PERFORMANCE SERIES

November 11, 2007 ■ 8pm

Men of Worth blend two voices and two cultural heritages, creating folk harmonies using a wide range of instruments. The duo combines traditional and contemporary songs in their performances — celebrating the folk music of their respective homelands, Ireland and Scotland.

Formed in 1986 by Scotsman Donnie MacDonald and Irishman James Keigher, Men of Worth (drawn from the title of a folk song by Scottish singer/songwriter Archie Fisher) developed a partnership that was both serious and fun. Although an international act that has toured and performed in concert halls and festivals around the world, James and Donnie now reside in Southern Oregon and Northern California respectively, while remaining true to their Gaelic roots.

St. Petersburg String Quartet

November 26, 2007 ■ 8pm

Hailed as one of the world's leading string quartets, the St. Petersburg String Quartet radiates pure passion and masterful musicianship. They have blazed a trail through concert halls from Toronto to Tokyo, from Lithuania to London, and across the United States to both critical and popular acclaim. In over twenty years together, the quartet has taken top honors at chamber music competitions around the globe and earned a Grammy Award nomination in 2001. During their stage performances, one marvel follows another — from searing evocations of Russian passion and sorrow to moments of folksy charm and headlong abandon. The musicians prove their supreme skill and versatility with dynamic playing of great sensitivity and interpretive subtlety, while adding a fresh dimension to their musical pieces.

"One of the most spectacularly well-knit groups in the world . . . It surpasses even groups like the Emerson..."
